Even with a strong vision and with the best people, strategic initiatives too often fail to execute successfully. Being able to adapt or drive changes in the market through new business models is crucial to remain competitive. However, the ability to effectively change the operating model is a harder task to manage. Therefore, transparency into business operations have become a critical competitive weapon. The company must act as one team, one culture, with the insight of how operations is performing to successfully manage the transformation.

- What does digitalisation mean for you? Is it a mean to optimise ways of working or a way to pursue new revenue streams or a bit of both?
- Who is responsible for making digitalisation initiatives successful?

Understanding this, leading organisations are now combining key capabilities into central transformation functions, tasked to streamline strategy execution. Software AG has become a part of these journeys, by providing key business capabilities to support strategy execution. In this roundtable, we will share and discuss these stories and our vision on 21stcentury business transformation.

- How often do strategic initiatives fall short of their original goals? What is the key reason?
- Is the speed with which you can currently implement changes enough to be competitive in the years to come?
- If we would ask people from different responsibility areas, e.g. LOB, Finance, IT, to describe an end-to-end process in your organization, is there a common view?
- How do you manage the challenge of implementing cross-functional changes?
